The Mainspring of Progress.

"Laziness is the mainspring of progress," said Mr. A. J. Martin at the gas exhibition, and he might have quoted facts to support his contention. It was a lay pointsman who, according to Sir George Finsley, hit on the principle long used for long-distance signal manipulation on our railways. Having to attend to two signals some distance apart, he sought to save himself a walk by fixing up an ingenious contrivance of wire and weights whereby both signals could be worked from his own desk. When the authorities discovered the contrivance they adopted it, and rewarded its inventor. In art, too, laziness has done service, for the rust left on his sword by a negligent servant gave Prince Rupert the first idea of mezzotint engraving.

Where American Engineers Fail.

From the Engineering News. Notwithstanding the leading position of the United States in crude oil production, every other manufacturing nation in the world is far in advance of us in the manufacture and use of crude oil engines. Many causes have operated to produce this result; but whatever these causes, the fact does exist that American mechanical engineering ability and progressiveness. The Swedish Diesel engine, which is now being taken up for manufacture here, has made an excellent record in Europe, and its builders and designers there are to take an active interest in its manufacture here. It may be, as is often claimed, that European engineers have been able to do so because they have been able to take the steady increase in the price of gas here and use it to their advantage. In this country also turn more and more toward the crude oil engines. In the southwest and on the Pacific coast especially there is an enormous field for the use of crude oil engines, which American manufacturers have hitherto failed to work to its full extent.
